OPINION: NO, THAT'S NOT AN ASTEROID, AND NO, IT'S NOT GETTING BIGGER

The community is in a tizzy after a supposed “historic meteorological report” arrived early Tuesday. Scientists have named an alleged incoming asteroid “Budweiser 20” and let me be clear—there is no need to panic. All empirical evidence leading up to this point indicates that there is a minuscule chance an asteroid hits our esteemed continent.

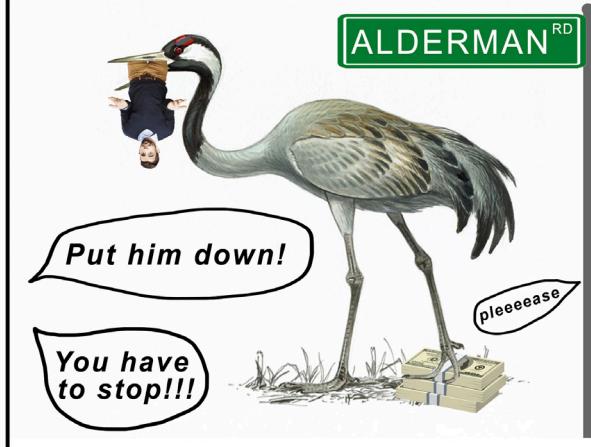

Local, reputable mastodon scientists and pterodactyl risk assessors have already assured our reporters ten times over. Your buried underground plants/other fauna investments will appreciate for millions of years, your 401K will perform well this quarter, and your nest of eggs nestled on the floor of an old-growth forest will be safe.

Farmers and the reactive Left claim that this mere pebble could set off “catastrophic climate disaster” or “shatter our supercontinent on impact.” Our society of scales and reptiles most certainly has the adequate infrastructure to avoid any of this. We are taller than the trees, which brush our knees and give us nothing more extreme than eczema. We scrape the sky, for Christ’s sake! These so-called experts are clearly exaggerating the size of the supposed meteor, even if it were to hit us at all. We’re too big to fail.

Some may say this is “overcompensating” for me “shitting my pants with fear” and that I’m allegedly “not able to wipe my shit-filled ass because my tiny t-rex arms are too minuscule and unsatisfying.” Anyone who spews these blasphemous lies should just go to the Yucatán peninsula and get hit by a meteor already.
